

I am opposed to the general use of cell phones aboard aircraft due to the close confinement of passengers, but if the electronic communications do not present safety problems, perhaps cell phone use limited to text messaging would be appropriate. This might represent a reasonable compromise where travelers could have access to communications, with minimal disruption to others. (Perhaps flight attendants could request that passengers place their phones on silent or vibrate mode, as a courtesy to fellow travelers.)